

Psychobiology, Vol. 2 (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Psychobiology, Vol. 2 In spite of the generally conceded fact that kinaesthetic processes are of fundamental importance in animal behavior, almost nothing is known that bears specifically upon these processes. All motor responses involve them, and maze studies have particularly emphasized them. In addition scattered observations abound in the literature describing position habits which have interfered with work directed primarily toward the analysis of other forms of sensitivity. In some cases these position habits have been merely the tendency to go to a definite side of the discrimination box at each trial. In other instances tendencies to alternate from one side of the apparatus to the other have been observed; and at least in one series of experimentation (dealing with audition in the rat) this simple alternation has been complicated by the addition of a sensory complex accompanying success. In this case the rat would go to one side of the apparatus trial after trial until escape was possible, whereupon it would go to the other side until escape was possible there. This was a case of simple alternation after success. It could not be termed a purely kinaesthetic automatism because of its modification by the factor of success. Success meant a free passage; failure meant running into the end-stop of the apparatus (1). Except for Carrs recent extended study of simple alternation (2) no attempt has been made to disentangle the kinaesthetic processes incident to all studies of discrimination from the matrix of other sensory processes in which they are obscured.
